EDITORIAL.

THE new academic year has once more rudely reminded us that life is not all bathing and moonshine. In another week naturalists will come upon that most beautiful of autumn birds—the first keen student strutting to the first lecture.

Among the novel fauna to be seen at this season will be those from the 'Varsities who, contracta pisces æquora sentiant, will find it difficult to realize that a surgeon is not a tutor, to be bluffed or bullied, but that he is indeed armed at every point with cutting instruments. Timid little fellows straight from school, however, need have no fear, for we started in close association with a monastery, and have all of us inherited some of the spirit of the sucking dove. Besides, the cold wind will be tempered for them by a stay in the Rooms, where the atmosphere would better be described as rich than harsh.

The practice of giving a heavy lecture from the Editorial chair to what are abusively termed "Freshmen" has fortunately been discontinued. It had only one result: people used to think the JOURNAL was always like that and never read it again. Besides, why deprive the new surgery dresser of his initial thrill on finding himself dropped defenceless into Armageddon? You yourself, hoary one, took much pleasure in luridly describing yourself to your friends as the Man of the Hour. Much better reading and more valuable information will be found in Sir Thomas Horder's address to Durham University Students, which we reprint in part on another page. It is only to be regretted that limited space has not permitted us to publish the whole of this memorable speech.
