NEVER in the history of the JOURNAL can the duty of welcoming the new Bartholomew's men have been so pleasant. Year after year it has been a matter of increasing difficulty to be original in expression if not in sentiment because, in the main, the conditions have changed very little. We could always congratulate you upon your wise discrimination or good fortune in your choice of an Alma Mater with such ancient traditions and such a glorious history. We could always point out those of your ancestors whose path you will aspire to follow—Harvey, Pott, Abernethy, Paget and the rest, who have made the name of St. Bartholomew's a symbol of the highest in the Art not so much by their personal attainments as by their bequests to posterity. We could even take it upon ourselves to offer you sage and avuncular advice as to your future conduct, your temptations, your scope and your responsibilities.

Never before, however, has there been as excellent an opportunity of saying nothing, of leaving you to look and see for yourselves, to realize what a privilege is yours. The spirit of learning for a time forsook the Charterhouse. The house has been swept and garnished, and we hope that there will return seven other spirits as excellent as the first, and that the last state shall be far better than the first. What you have seen is but the first-fruits of the self-sacrificing toil and energy of the authorities, the extent of which can be but dimly understood when we look upon the finished work. These results we will not attempt to describe at present for fear of repetition in the next issue, which will be concerned mainly with the new College.
